[6] The Second Circuit's decision, however, was vacated by the U.S. Supreme Court on July 17, 1989, which overruled the earlier ruling. See In re Joint Eastern and Southern District Asbestos Litigation, 897 F.2d 626 (2d Cir.1990). Q: Can I use MVC 4 with Grails? My team wants to use MVC 4, with my preferred libraries, but also wants to use Grails, as it's a better framework than plain Java, and I would rather not build this thing from scratch. We'd like to use the MVC as the structure, however, and not just an additional layer on top of the stack. Would we be able to use both MVC 4 and Grails together, or is that impossible? Thanks, A: There are at least two ways to do this. One way is to create a Grails controller and a MVC controller. Then use a controller to determine which one to call based on some variable in the request. If you do this with Spring MVC, you would probably be able to do it through a filter or a servlet mapping or in a controller without too much difficulty. On the other hand, you could use some web framework that supports MVC 4. I know the Grails guys have one called GSP4, though I don't think it's fully supported. There's also is Wicket MVC which I know they are trying to get more active again. If you prefer Swing, you can use Stripes. All of these solutions would be very
