A spectral window in the green region of the visible spectrum at 580-600 nm allows measurement of intrinsic fluorescence of microcalcification. A light source calibrated to deliver light that is restricted to the green range of the visible spectrum (i.e. 580-600 nm) has been used to record a luminescence signal that originates from the organic fluorescence of microcalcifications embedded in an acellular bovine bone matrix. The luminescence arises from specific absorption of green light by the bovine bone matrix, which fluoresces due to autofluorescence. The intensity of the luminescence recorded is inversely proportional to the rate of biodegradation of the acellular bovine bone matrix. The spectral resolution of the light delivered to the bone matrix is greater than 10 nm, and the spectral characteristics of the luminescence observed are consistent with that of intrinsic fluorescence of microcalcifications.
