The only downside was that the shower could have been a little bigger, but it was spotless and I thought it was great value for money." Most recent review "This hotel was convenient and in a great location. However, the price and upkeep of the room really took away from the experience. The carpet was torn and the bed was lumpy. How are the three-dimensional feature representations encoded in macaque monkey's visual cortex? The central question of this study was to examine how the three-dimensional (3-D) surface feature representation in the primary visual cortex (V1) is encoded. To this end, we measured the response of V1 neurons to the 3-D surface of a moving bar-shaped, sharp-edged texture in two macaque monkeys. The depth contrast of the texture was sufficient to dissociate texture-from-texture segregation, which is available only when the bar edge position varies across the depth-space. We observed that responses to the 3-D surface exhibited the receptive field size and the localization/position invariance characteristics. Moreover, the orientation-tuning properties of V1 neurons with both anterior and posterior receptive fields were in agreement with those to the 2-D contour. Our results suggest that 3-D surface feature representation is organized into discrete, elongated, 3-D surfaces, which are aligned in
