The development of assays for rapid analysis of susceptibility to antifungal agents is urgently needed for the early diagnosis of antifungal resistance in patients with invasive fungal infections (IFIs). The purpose of this study was to explore dye-efflux assays for rapid susceptibility analysis of yeast isolates and to compare it with the results from the standard susceptibility tests. Data from 2010-2011 were obtained from a local microbiology laboratory in Taiwan, and included yeast isolates that were identified using the API 20C AUX system and that were in vitro tested for susceptibility to amphotericin B, fluconazole, caspofungin, micafungin and anidulafungin by the broth microdilution method. These isolates had been used to construct an established yeast colony. Efflux activity was analyzed by a colorimetric assay and by flow cytometry. Forty-one (16.3%) of the 240 yeast isolates exhibited multidrug resistance. For the colorimetric assay, correlation coefficients between the results from the dye-efflux and standard assays were $r = 0.46$ ($p = 0.002$), 0.34 ($p = 0.029$), 0.40 ($p = 0.003$), 0.27 (p 1cb139a0ed
