We demonstrated the efficacy of a short course of pre-emptive combined treatment of pre-fracture and post-fracture periods in reducing pain and signs of inflammation in patients with osteoporotic fractures. Moreover, our data revealed a down-regulation of some pro-inflammatory and pro-catabolic cytokines and a normalization of the expression of MMP-9 in the post-fracture period after the pre-emptive combined treatment. Activation of the innate immune system during the post-fracture period is one of the most important processes contributing to the loss of bone tissue. An enhanced cytokine production by bone marrow-derived cells or bone tissue at the site of fracture has been reported in experimental animals as well as in clinical studies of patients with fractures ([@B22], [@B23]). In the present study, we detected elevated plasma concentrations of TNF- α and MIP-1 β in both pre- and post-fracture patients, which may be due to a local bone remodeling in the fracture site. Although many data suggest that bone remodeling is impaired in patients with SLE, in this group of patients, excessive bone turnover may be related to hyper-reactive immune
